Dear Mr. Krimer,

I was delighted to see the enclosed tribute to you and your largely unsung colleagues in the New York Times earlier this month. The project you and I discussed is not dead but is on a burner that is pretty far back. At least it has had the benefit to me of making your acquaintance. I was especially impressed with the unique perspective which you and other high level interpreters have to contribute to the record of modern history. Is there any vehicle by which interpreters such as you can make their contribution to the historical record while still respecting the obvious constraints? I hope there is. I enclose an article and an exchange of letters from Scientific American which may be of some interest to you.

With best wishes for the New Year,

Sincerely yours,
