This is a report given to me by the US Army CW people. They said it was related to their most promising work on incapacitants (this was in ^{early} ~~late~~ 1989).
It all sounded a bit loony to me.

I've left the HASC as of 4/30, and I'm now working for the National Academy of Sciences on their Computer Science & Technology Board. The collapse of the cold war in the last year convinced me
that the arms control game is now dying,
since the US & SU are both scrambling
to put arms control together.

Best... hope all's well with you.
If you're in DC, give a call & let's have lunch

Aspirin understands, for example, that MIRD bilateral was a loss.

Draw the analogy.

Good if only US

control technology

will spread

Will not know it.

Then Jim Miller. Not Larry ~~Q~~ Smith.

One thing sure learned was that nuclear weapons possible. Changes mind set.
